The quality of care provided in nursing homes in the North-West of Scotland has been the subject of national guidelines, audit programmes and evaluation research. This research reported here investigates the concept of quality of care, asking nursing home staff and relatives to name what they consider the defining characteristics of a good quality of care. The core aim is to explore how staff and relatives use the term and, in doing so, understand it and its relationship to health and well-being. The sample consisted of 120 people: staff from nursing homes and their relatives, in the North-West of Scotland. It was found that staff used quality of care to refer to the physical and relational aspects of care, in particular the treatment and care given to residents. Relatives used the concept of quality of care to refer to the personal aspects of care, including the availability of human contact, staffing levels and competence. There is a discrepancy between what staff think is important and what relatives consider to be the most important aspects of quality of care.
