Hmm. I guess it depends on the data you downloaded. I've only used BitTorrent to download large files. It is extremely difficult to accurately calculate the total size of the data because a single piece of data can be fragmented multiple times. You can measure it by checking the zip file before you unzip it. I don't know why it is necessary to download a zipped file if you only want to verify the SHA-256 data. They're identical unless the files have been tampered with. Hello, I used the SFV Check application on Windows 10. My girlfriend was downloading a TV series as a ZIP file from a website. Before she started the process, I checked the ZIP file and verified that the SFV item was valid and that the hash and CRC32 calculated correctly. After she started the download, I checked the status of the file and discovered that it was corrupted. I re-checked the ZIP file and found the same issue – an incorrect CRC32. When I checked the file on a different computer, I discovered the exact same issue on this computer as well. I used the application and it confirmed that the same problem exists. The application is missing a few files. Why can't you upload files such as this: I'm getting a 'invalid packet: completed' error when trying to open the link. However, if I download the PDF, open it on my computer, and read it (non-SFV file) it opens just fine. An extra set of parentheses
