Cellular response to heat stress is mediated by specific signals and involves the activation of a set of genes, known to be related to the thermal stress response. Microarray technology gives a global view of the transcriptional response. We characterized the global response of Chlamydomonas reinhardtii to heat shock by hybridizing a GeneChip (Agilent). The microarrays were used to measure differences in transcription between a wild type strain (CC-503) and a thermophilic strain (11T-7), grown under the same experimental conditions and time course. A comparative analysis of the differentially regulated genes with a few other microarray studies of Chlamydomonas was performed. A global picture of the transcriptional response of the two strains in response to heat stress was obtained. The use of real time quantitative PCR confirmed that our microarray results were consistent with those from an independent biological replicate. A total of 123 genes were differentially expressed between wild type and thermophilic mutant. Genes related to oxidative stress response were up-regulated while genes related to responses to temperature stress were down-regulated. A number of genes previously associated with temperature stress response were found to be regulated in response to heat stress. Interestingly, the heat shock protein

The effect of a polyacrylonitrile (PAN)-based material on the visible-light-induced decolorization of methyl orange (MO) in the presence of TiO_2 (PAN-NPs/TiO_2 composite material) was evaluated. The treatment was carried out in a flow-through photoreactor using a laboratory-scale fluidized bed. The obtained results showed that the PAN-NPs/TiO_2 material was able to promote the visible-light-induced decolorization of MO, with values of removal exceeding 90% after 3.3 h of treatment. Besides, the PAN-NPs/TiO_2 material was found to improve the stability of TiO_2 in such conditions, increasing the efficiency of the treatment. In addition, the reactivity order of the MO dye with PAN-NPs/TiO_2 composite material in the presence of TiO_2 and in the absence of TiO_2 was determined, indicating that the PAN-NPs/TiO_2 material was found to be more reactive in the presence of TiO_2.Q: HTML tag and Doctype I want to display the following html on a web page.
