The present invention generally relates to switching mode power supplies and, more particularly, to techniques for improving the efficiency of switched mode power supplies having phase locked loops for regulating the switching frequency. Conventional switching mode power supplies commonly use phase locked loops to regulate the switching frequency of power switches included in the power supply. Ideally, a phase locked loop controls the power switches to produce a square wave, and the zero crossings of the square wave correspond to the power supply producing its maximum power. In practice, however, the zero crossings of the square wave do not correspond to the maximum power. Instead, the zero crossings of the square wave tend to correspond to a lower power than the maximum power. Because power is wasted by the power supply during the time when the zero crossings of the square wave do not correspond to the maximum power, it is desirable to reduce the amount of power wasted. A conventional solution to reduce the amount of power wasted is to increase the duty cycle of the power switches. Increasing the duty cycle increases the average power and, because the zero crossings of the square wave tend to correspond to a lower power than the maximum power, reduces the amount of power wasted. Another solution is to provide a variable duty cycle that increases the duty cycle when the power consumption is less than a predetermined power level. Increasing the duty cycle, however, increases the amount of power radiated from the power supply. Moreover, increasing the duty cycle can
